I see that electronic bathroom fixtures will be discussed during your study session tonight. May I offer some observations and comment? This type of fixture is ideal for Airports, Restaurants, and high traffic, unmonitored facilities. They control water usage and offer the sanitary benefit of not having to touch valves. My bathroom is not an Airport nor a restaurant. There is no appreciable benefit to this fixture in the home bathroom, usage is too small. It seems this was a token ordinance in response to drought conditions and demands that City government 'do something'.

What I find perplexing is that the City focused on the fixture I must use while approving thousands of units of housing, 340 hotel rooms and a convention center.

My bathroom would seem to be a portion of one drop in the bucket by comparison.

Respectfully Submitted,

Mark Kent
